resent, and belonged apparently to the "midle age" of the crincline period. Not long after the Empress passed, came the head of a brilliant column, preceded by the Imperial sersome or effective. This column was formed of the officers of the Emperor's Court, and the rear was brought up by His Imperial Majesty Louis Napoleon III. He was in the uniform of a General of Division—although he really might wear a Marshal's ostrich-feathered hat without any great self-elevation, as he commanded a French army in a great and successful campaign—and looked in excellent health, though some persons pretended to see a want of firmness in his tread, which no ordinary observer could detect. He led by the hand on his right side the Prince Imperial, who was dressed in black velvet, with knickerbookers of the same material, showing a pair of thin but shapely legs, encased in manve coloured silk stockings. The Prince walked with great composure, through the admiring ladies and gentlemen who formed line, through the hall up to the Throne, bowing repeatedly. He has not much colour; his fair hair is fine and rather straight; but he is a very intelligent-looking little gentleman, and does not give the impression of any suffering or malady whatever, nor can the word "sickly," or even the word "delicate," be well applied to his aspect. Having entered the halt amid loud cries of "Vive l' Empereur," "Vive l' Impéra-trie," and "Vive le Prince Impérial," the procassion advanced to the Throne, which is well known to all visitors to the Louvre. The Emperor, standing with his officers behind him, and with the Empress and Prince on his left and right, proceeded to read the speech amid signs of great impatience for silence and of marked attention, and as soon as the words of his load resonant voice began to be heard there was a "hush," which subsided into noiseless attention till the first striking paragraph was followed by cries of "Bravo!" Tree bien!" and clapping of hands. Frenchmen say that the Emperors. pronunciation of the language is marked by an accent which they call either "foreign" or "German" at discretion. Perhaps that difficulty. may be created by the obstinate habit which revails among some people of not accepti. His Majesty's words in the common way, and in seeking for them some non-natural sense or The first sentence, perhaps, which provoked The first sentence perhaps, which provoked an expression of opinion was that in which the Emperor spoke of the imposing spectacle of conciliation and peace offered by France to the world, in spite of which disquictude had existed in the public mind respecting Germany. The allusion to the Exhibition and to the prejudices it had destroyed was well received, but the warmest outbreak of applause came when the Emperor declared that it was a content of the entering the military or necessity for France to render her military or-ganization perfect as well as her armament and navy. His Majesty's manner became more ani-mated as he proceeded, and at the conclusion of the discourse his face was slightly flashed. He was evidently pleased with the effect which had been produced by his words on the vast and tent with their hopes of some declaration of a grand policy, they should be kept without their hats or coats by the break-down of the Imperial administration in that department. The New Chinese Mission. (From the Supreme Court & Consular Gazette.) Le we could only bring ourselves to believe that the mission of Mr. Burlingshie was the result of a sincere desire on the part of the Chinese Covernment that China should really enter into the comity of civilized nations, what a sketch we might draw of the reforms which would necessarily epring from it. In the first place, we might look with confidence to a more vigorous administration of the internal government, and a perfect system of law, and what blessings social and political would not this last result produce? We have always felt that the great argument against supposing China to have ever been greater in the sense of being more powerful or more civilized than she is now, is to be found in the absence of any system of Lana It is hardly possible to imagine that a country could have ever possessed, z as China is represented to have in past times possessed, a radiodant population, vast sources of wealth, a firm and intelligent government, capable of enforcing peace at home and respect abroad, and a people educated even to refine ment, and with a knowledge of the arts and v. sciences that would even in these days be considered as respectable, and yet have been en-tirely wanting in a philosophical system of laws, capable of extension and suitable to I the wants of a great people. Yet in China at the present day there are absolutely no traces of any such a system ever having existed. It is impossible to conceive that they have disappeared, simply because matters less people have survived; and, if, as is undoubted-true in the matter of art, nay even of scien-connected with the well-being of the distinguished assemblage in the ball.

The ceremony of the day appeared to have terminated with the speech, and the Imperial procession reformed and returned in the order in which it had arrived; but their Majesties stopped at intervals before they left the Louvie to speak to various personages whom they recognized as they passed down the line. It may be comforting so us to know that sometimes things are exceedingly ill-managed in France. Nothing could be worse than the arrangements at the Vestiaire, which nearly produced a small éneute, particularly among those who complained that, after a speech which meant so little, or was at least so little consis-tific attainments, there is in this generation evidence of the knowledge which in these particulars former generations possessed, we may fairly presume, that the absence of evidence of China ever having at any time been able to boast of a system of jurisprudence worthy of the name, is pretty conclusive, and incontestibly establishes that in her palmiest day this great source of independence, peace, and happiness to her people was wanting. Without these three essential elements of prosperity it is simply impossible for a country to have been in any sense of the word, great Laws, it is true, exist, and probably have existed for centuries, but their atter want of system. o arrangement, or applicability to the wants of a great nation are manifest. They might indeed the rather called "rules of stick," than laws, for every wrong is a crime, and every remedy 2. blow. We can well understand that China was i ignorant of the rights or obligations imposed on nations by that system of justice known by the name of international law. Her isolation, the variness of her territories, and the immense space which separated her from other nations, a satisfactorily account for her ignorance on such subjets; but that there should be I wanting some rational and philosophic system than exists of those branches of the general law which guide men in their business relations with each other; which affect trade-and quite as much internal as external trade: which bear on contracts, the carriage of goods, the relations of principal and agente, the is a matter of profound surprise. Here, then, is a subject worthy of Mr. Burlingame's attention, if not of his ambition. Before China can enter fully, or even safely for her own interests, into the comity of civilized nations, she must do sumething in the way of creating a legal system at any rate, a system of commercial law in accordance with those general principles which have been recognised as essential to the guidance of nations as well as individuals in their commercial transactions with one another. Either she must at once adopt the French Code, which is the base of most of the legal systems of Continental na-tions, or in view of her more extended relations with England and the United States, she must affiliate the system which those countries have created, and to which they owe a large share of their commercial prosperity—or her rulers and statements must set themselves to the task of establishing a commercial code of her own-

In the wake of commerce will come a knowledge, or at least an interest in science and in arts, and science and art may in their turn awaken a love of inquiry and a desire to learn, which itself i the best pioneer of a purer religion, and a healthier eyetem of mora a.
